Dennise Nahmias (née Angel) was born in 1924 in Saloniki (Thessaloniki), Greece. In 1941, her brother and her father moved to Athens, Greece in order to advance their manufacturing business. Meanwhile, Dennise and her mother were in Saloniki when the Germans occupied Greece in April 1941. Their house was requisitioned by a German officer, and they were evicted. When no alternate accommodations were arranged for them, Dennise and her mother asked to be allowed to travel to Athens. Their request was granted, and they joined Dennise’s father and brother.

When Athens fell into German hands, the family went into hiding. The four of them scattered and lived with three different Gentile Greek families. Members of Dennise’s family lived with a former landlord of theirs, with a lawyer who housed other Jews, as well as communists and soldiers, and with an employee of the French Academy.

All of Dennise’s family survived in hiding until the end of the war. She eventually married another survivor, Albert Joseph Nahmias.
