

Summary

Anatole Gorko was born in Lodz, Poland on June 28, 1907 of well-to-do Zionists. He worked in his father's spinning factory until 1939, when Germany invaded Poland. He fought in the Polish Army for 3 weeks, after being in the Reserves was taken in a prisoner of war camp for a few weeks. He found himself with his family in the center of the Lodz Ghetto in January 1940 and he describes the life there. He worked as head cashier for the ghetto stores until August 1944. He and his family including his wife and child were finally taken to Auschwitz, in cattle cars, where, in the presence of Mengele, only he and his brother-in-law were selected for work and the rest of the family perished. He remained there for 1 month, then pretended to be a mechanic and was selected for a camp in Sudeten where after 2 weeks of training he worked on V2 rockets. Here he managed to sabotage, and persuade other workers, including German mechanics, to sabotage the work. He worked there from September 1944 until May 1945 when the Russians liberated the area. He made his way back to Lodz where he remarried, became head of the textile production for Communist Poland, but decided to leave. He smuggled himself and his wife to Munich, and waited from 1946 to 1948 to obtain necessary papers to resettle in the U.S.A. He describes in some detail his adjustment to the U.S.
